Now First Published. CHAPTER XIII. WHAT NEXT!

What was to be done? Mrs. Sidebottom was the first to see what was to be done. "I shall take out an administration at once," she said. Philip said nothing. Of course she must do what she said. She was the proper person to take out an administration as nearest of kin. But he was not thinking of her and of what she proposed to do. He was standing still with the will in his hand. Salome had not regisimed it as it was worthless. He proceeded to fold it and replace it in the cover. Philip was not easy in his mind. He had spoken in a rude manner to the girl, throwing a gross charge against her, and had grievously hurt her.

Was the charge just ? Was it possible to exnlain the peculiar circumstances in any other way than that which had occurred to him? Suddenly looking up at Mrs. Sidebottom, and then at the Captain, he looked down again. and this time with great attention at the envelope "The cuvelope has been tampered with." he

"In what way ?" asked Mrs. Sidebottom. "It has been opened by means of a heated penknife. Here are the marks of the smoke that have been rubbed off the blade upon the paper and here arecuts made by the knife in the paper. The envelope, ofter having been scaled, was opened carofully, even cunningly." "Why carefully or cunningly I cannot tel posed he would take pains to do it in such manuer. He had plenty of leng envelopes at hand. Then again; to refasten it a different scaling-wax was employed to what had seen used before, a slight difference in tint of scarlet, and one impression of the stamp can be traced over the other, the earlier not being wholly obliterated. Excuse me one moment. Aunt Louisa. I should like to have a look at my uncle's study. "Philip-the room is in disorder 1" said Mrs. Sidebottom, starting to her feet and finshing. "I cannot really; up n my word I will not permit----

. But he had left the room before she con prevent him. She moved to follow him, but reconsidered herself and turned back. "Fiddlesticks!" she said, angrily! " nothing but fiddlesticks."

"I am the sufferer." grumbled Lambert; "I shall be left in the cold. You and Philip take everything.". "What I have serves to make you comfortable," retorted the mother. "That may be," answered Lambort, " but it is one thing to have money of one's own, and another thing to have to come to one's mammy for every penny, and to find that the mammy rarely bas any pennius in her purso.

"Hitherto I have been pinched in circums

"It is as I thought," said ha. "The sealingwax employed the second time is that now in the pen tray on my uncle's desk; not or y so, but his knife is there also, bearing on it he traces of exposure to fire. It was probably inrust into the flame of the gas to heat it so as to enable to dissolve the wax off the seal." "No doubt about it;" said Mrs. Sidebotton

"and this proves that Jeremiah capcel: ____his wi shortly before his death. I should not be an prised if he did it the same night that he die immediately before giving it to Salome." "The case is a most extraordinary one," said entered the garden. The garden, as already said, descended from the house to the valley. It consisted of two slopes, divided by a wall; the upper slope ended in a terrace walk with the coping of the wall serving as a parapet to it. Access to the lower garden was obtained by a flight of steps at each end. The upper of the two divisions was devoted to flowers, the lower to vegetables, and fruit trees were trained against the wall that and ends. Besides, no one would be so mean." buttressed up the terrace.

Philip paced the upper terrace for severa minutes, and was unable to come to a decision, he could not see that the matter was simple as hi aunt pretended. For, as he argued, why should his unclo have taken pains to preserve the original envelops when there was no apparent necessity for so doing. If anyone else had opened the envelope, then he could understand the care taken to preserve it with its superscription, "The Last Will and Testament of Jeremish Pennycomequick," and to conceal the fact that it had been adroitly unclosed.

But who we also here been likely to commit such an act? Certainly not Salome, in whose keeping, under look and key, the will had been It was hardly possible that it had been tampered with since it was given to Ler. Was it possible that it had been cancelled before, unknown to Jeremiah P Philipsaw that he had not the data, or had not data sufficient, on which to come to a deci sion. He must have snother interview with Salome. He therefore returned to the Louse, and meeting a servant in the hall, asked her to request Miss Cusworth to speak with him a few minutes in the garden. Without delay Salome came. She had not put on a bonnet, but had thrown a gray shawl over her head, and pinned it under her chin like a mill-girl. Some of her burnished wir, like autumn dak-leaves flaming in the evoning son shone out from under the shawl, and the grey wool contrasted pleasantly with the delicately beautiful complexion, now no longer white, but with flying tinges of colour in it. like a sunset sky in which are drifts of vapour, high aloft undefined, yet sensitive to the rays of the dechining orb.
